I

THE Runic character I for this vowel was named is:—Is byþ oferceald ungemetum slidor; glisnaþ glæshluttur gimum gelicust, Runic pm. Kmb. p. 341.

The short i generally corresponds to Gothic i, e.g. in, Goth. in.

bidan, Goth. bidjan; the long i, which is sometimes written ii, e.g. riiknæ on the Ruthwell Cross, to Gothic ei, e.g. isern, Goth. eisarn, bīdan, Gothic beidan. In early West Saxon MSS., however, i, ii are found arising from other sources. Thus the mutation of the breaking ea is written i, e.g. ildu, irmpu from eald, earn; and the mutations of eó, eā are written i, e.g. onlihtan, htran. In such cases, however, instead of i the diphthong ie is very often found; and not only in such, but also in those where the root-vowel is i or ii, e.g. ongietan, wietan [= witan]; even in the place of y, e.g. ieðegende. In the later MSS., instead of i or ie, y is found very commonly; indeed even in the earlier MSS. y has in some instances already made its way into the place of i, thus ryht is the form regularly used in Alfred's translation of Gregory's Pastoral Care. In the case of niht in the earliest times, in that of miht and its compounds in later, i takes the place of original a.

Initial i before a, o, u is found where most generally ge is used; for examples see below.

iā; adv. Yea:—Æt ðū tōðæg? Iā ic dyde manducasti hodie? Etiam feci, Ælfc. Gr. 31; Som. 40, 17. Eart ðū Esau min sunu? And hē cwæþ: Iā leof ic hit eom tu es filius meus Esau? Respondit: Ego sum, Gen. 27, 23. Se kyng befealh georne hire brēder óþ ðæt hē cwæþ jā wid the king pressed her brother eagerly until he said yes in reply, Chr. 1067; Erl. 204, 23. v. geā.

iāces sūre, Wrt. Voc. 286, 21. v. geāc.

iācinð, es; m. Jacinth:—Iacinde [iacinte, Cot. MS.] ex hyacintho, Past. 14, 4; Swt. 87, 3.

Ianuarius; m. January:—Forma mōnaþ folc mycel Ianuarii hēton the Romans called the first month January, Menol. Fox 19; Men. 10.

Gr. 9, 21; Som. 10, 42-4. iēestre, an; f. v. preceding word.

iēge gold, Beo. Th. 2219; B. 1107. The translation of this phrase is difficult. Thorpe has 'moreover,' Kemble 'heaped up;' Heyne suggests comparison with Sskr. ic dominare, imperare, and gives 'Schatzgold, reiches gold;' Grein's note is as follows: 'Sollte vielleicht zu ieg das Altn. yggir [terror] zu halten sein, da das Gold Altn. auch ógnar ljómi [splendor terroris] heisst? oder sollte sich etwa der Begriff Sühngold herausbringen lassen?' Grundtvig suggests the reading ice-gold, i.e. gold given in addition on the occasion of a solemn reconciliation.

Icelingas; pl. The name of a Mercian family to which St. Guthlac belonged:—Hē was ðæs yldestan and ðæs ædelstan cynnes ðe Icelingas wæron genemmede hē [Guthlac's father] was of that chiefest and noblest race that were called Icelings, Guthl. 1; Gdwin. 8, 4. [Icelingtūn (Ickleton in Cambridgeshire?) occurs Cod. Dipl. Kmb. iv. 300, 24; and there is Icklingham in Suffolk.]

i-dæges; adv. On the same day:—Se ðe sleá his ágenne þeówne esne and hē ne sý idæges deað he who smites his own slave, and he die not on the same day, L. Alf. 17; Th. i. 48, 13. infangeneþeof 'the right to judge one's own thief when taken within the jurisdiction, and the privilege consequent upon that jurisdiction, viz. the receiving of the mulct, or money-payment for the crime,' Cod. Dipl. Kmbl. i. xlv. The word, which does not occur in the earlier laws, is thus defined in those of Edward the Confessor:—De infangeneþef. Justitia cognoscens latronis sua est de homine suo, si captus fuerit super terram suam, L. Ed. C. 22; Th. i. 452, 4. In the preceding chapter, 'descriptio libertatum diversarum,' it is said the lords 'habere eos [their men who had committed crime] ad rectum in curia sua, si haberent sacham et socham, tol et theam, et infangene thef.' Other passages in which the word is found are L. Wil. I. 2; Th. i. 467, 27. Si quis eorum, qui habent soche et sache et tol et them et infangene theof, implacitetur in comitatu; and L. H. xx. c; Th. i. 528, 9. Archiepiscopi, episcopi, comites, et alie potestates in terris proprie potestatis sue sacam et socnam habent tol et them et infongentheaf. The word also occurs in the following charters of Edward the Confessor:—Concedo eis in omnibus terris suis prænominatis, consuetudines hic Anglice scriptas, scilicet, infangene þeóf, etc. Chart. Th. 359, 3. A similar enumeration occurs in 384, 25 and in 411, 32. In 369, 13 the word occurs in an Anglo-Saxon charter. See also Cod. Dipl. Kmbl. iv. 227, 9, where is the form 'mid infangenum þeófe.'

-ing. I. a patronymic suffix:—Some naman syndon patronymica, dæt synd fæderlice naman, æfter Grēciscum þeāwe, ac seō Lēdenspræc næfþ ða naman; hī sind swā ðeah on Engliscr spræce, Penda, and of ðam Pending, Ælf. Gr. 5; Som. 4, 52-4. Ælfrēd Æþelwulving Alfrēd the son of Æthelwulf, Chr. 871; Erl. 76, 3. The use of this suffix is well shown by the genealogies in the Chronicle, e.g. pref; Erl. pp. 2, 4; 855; Erl. 68, 69, with which may be compared similar lists in Icelandic where -son is used. See also Lk. Skt. Lind. 3, 23-38 where the suffix is used with the foreign names, e.g. Seth Adaming Seth son of Adam. In a rather extended sense the suffix is found in the names of families or peoples, who are regarded as descendants of a common ancestor, and traces of this use remain in many place-names in England. 'The Wælsings, in Old Norse Völsungar, reappear at Walsingham in Norfolk, Wolsingham in Northumberland, and Woosingham in Durham. The Billings at Billing, Billingham, Billingshoe, etc. Such local names are for the most part irregular compositions, of which the former part is the patronymic -ing, declined in the genitive plural. The second portion is a mere definition of the locality, as -geat, -hyrst, -hām, -wic, -tūn, -stede, and the like. In a few cases the patronymic stands alone in the nominative plural, as Tōtingas, Tooting, Surrey; Wōcingas, Woking, Surrey; Meallingas, Malling, Kent. . . In dealing, however, with these names, some amount of caution is necessary: it is by no means enough that a name should end in -ing, to convert it into a genuine patronymic. On the contrary it is a power of that termination to denote the genitive or possessive, which is also the generative case: and in some local names we do find it so used: thus Ædelwulving lond [Cod. Dipl. No. 179, a. 801] is exactly equivalent to Ædelwulfes lond, the estate of a duke Ædelwulf, not of a family called Ædelwulfs. So again, dæt Folcwinning lond [Cod. Dipl. No. 195, a. 811], dæt Wynhearding lond [Cod. Dipl. No. 195, a. 811], imply the land of Folcwine, of Wynheard, not of marks or families called Folcwings, and Wynheardings. [Cf. Cæsering not markers of families called Folcwings, and Wynheardings. [Cf. Cæsering not markers of families called Folcwings, and Wynheardings. [Cf. Cæsering not markers of families called Folcwings, and Wynheardings. . . Woolbedington, Wool Lavington, Barlavington, are respectively Wulfbædington, Wulfbædington, Beorlavington, the tūn or dwelling of Wulfbæd, Wulfbæd, and Beorlāf. Between such words and genuine patronymics the line must be carefully drawn, a task which requires both skill and experience; the best security is, where we find the patronymic in the genitive plural. . . Changes for the sake of euphony must also be guarded against, as sources of error: thus Abingdon in Berks would impel us strongly to assume a family of Abingas; the Saxon name Æbban dūn convinces us that it was named from an Æbba [m.], or Æbbe [f.]. Dunnington is not Duning tūn, but Dunnan tūn. Kemble's Saxons in England, i. 59, nn; see also the text in the following pages, and Taylor's Names and Places, pp. 82-3, 89. As was seen above in Adaming, the native suffix could be applied in the case of individuals to foreign names: it was so also in the case of peoples. Thus in the Rushworth Gloss, Mt. 8, 28, 'in lond geransinga' translates in regionem Gerasenorum; in 10, 15 'eorde sodominga and gomorringa' is the rendering of terra Sodomorum et Gomorraeorum, and above in v. 5 of the same chapter we have 'cæstra samatinga' for civitates samaritanorum. These may be compared with the forms in the Chronicle, West Kentingas, 999; Erl. 134, 28; East Centingas, 1009; Erl. 142, 19; Centingas, 1011; Erl. 144, 27. II. The suffix is also found in nouns formed from adjectives with a force which may be seen in the following examples:—ædcling a prince: earning a wretch.

ing the name of the nasal guttural ŋ ng, in the Runic alphabet. In the Gothic the name seems to have been iggws, see Zacher, Das Gotische Alphabet, p. 3. In the Runic poem 22; Kmb. 343, 27 it is taken as the name of a prince of the East Danes:—Ing was ærest mid East Denum gesewen secgum; ðþ hē siddan eft ofer wæg gewāt. ðus heardingas ðone hæle nemdon. This name [cf. Gothic form] may be the same as that found in a genealogy in the Chronicle a. 547:—Esa was Inguing Ingui Angenwitting, Erl. 16, 11. As a proper name or as part of a proper name Ingui occurs in Icelandic, e.g. Ingvi-björg, Ingveldr, Ingimundr, Ingólfr: 'many more compounds are found in the Swedish-Runic stones as this name was national among the ancient Swedes; cf. also Yngvi and Ynglingar.' Cl. and Vig. Ing. For the Rune see Zacher, pp. 30, 56-7: Taylor's Greeks and Goths, pp. 31, 82; and for the name Grmn. D. M. pp. 320-1.

K.

THE letter k appears to have had no distinct duty to perform in the oldest English, but to have been a mere variant of c. In the MSS. (more particularly the Cotton) of Alfred's translation of Gregory's Pastoral Care, where in the words kyning, kynn &c. it occurs not unfrequently, this writing is not uniform. Thus in Sweet's edition Angelcynn is found p. 2, ll. 3, 13, but Angelcynn l. 4; whilst in each case the Hatton MS. has c. So in the following page in l. 10, kynn, in l. 20, cynn. On pp. 2, 3, l. 1 kyning is the writing of both MSS. while pp. 34, 35, l. 14 it is cyning: p. 32, 20-1 we find kyning, kynehad, the Hatton MS. in the same passage has c: p. 38, ll. 13, 18 kyning, kynestol, where the Hatton MS. has cyning, kynestol, pp. 6, 7, l. 18 both have kynerice: p. 84, ll. 10, 12, 13 kynelic occurs four times, in the Hatton MS. it is twice written with c, twice with k. On p. 212, l. 15 is found Crist, while the Hatton writes Krist; on p. 152, line 5 the Cotton MS. has kraft, the Hatton MS. craft. On p. 459, ll. 29, 31, 32 (Hatton MS.) occur the forms kokka, kokkum, kok. So in the Chronicle, Erl. p. 8, l. 15 kyning, but

p. 6, l. 23 cyning: p. 24, l. 1, kyning; 26, 1, cyning. The later use with regard to the letter may be, to some extent, illustrated from the concluding years. For many years previous to 1111 the form is cyng, in that year we have Kyng Henri; again until 1122 the opening line of each annual contains the phrase Cyng Henri, then until the end the spelling is k.

Words beginning with k are to be looked for under c.

In the later specimens of the West Saxon dialect those words in which the vowel a immediately preceded a combination of consonants beginning with l are generally found to have undergone a change which was represented by writing ea instead of a. This change does not occur to the same extent in the earlier specimens, and seems not to occur at all in the Northumbrian dialect, or in the kindred languages. Thus in the translation of Gregory's Pastoral Care and in the Parker MS. of the Chronicle alle, onwuld are found as well as ealle, onweald, while in Ælfric's Homilies they are regularly written in the latter form. So the West Saxon forms, healdan, sealt, healf, are found in the Northumbrian Gospels as halda, salt, half, and in Gothic, O. Sax., Icel., O. H. Ger. the vowel also is a.

In the Runic alphabet the character, which in name and form agrees with the Scandinavian rune l, lōgr, was l, lagu. The same name seems to have been given to the corresponding letter in the Gothic alphabet, though it occurs only in a corrupt form laar = lagus. The meaning of this word may be seen from the verses in the Runic poem that are devoted to the letter:

Lagu byþ leóðum langsum geþuht gif hī sculum nēþan on nacan tealtum and hī sæþþa swýðe brēgaþ and se brimhengest bridles ne gýmþ	water to wanderers wearisome seemeth if they must venture on vessel unsteady and them the sea-waves sorely affright and the sea-horse steering despiseth.

lāo; generally neuter, but occasionally feminine [v. Shrn. pp. 3-4], or masculine, as in the compound lyb-lāc q. v. The idea which lies at the root of the various meanings of this and of the next word seems to be that of motion. Thus lācan and Icel. leika are used to describe the motion of a vessel riding on the waves, the flight of a bird as it rises and falls in the air, the flickering, wavering motion of flame, and the like; while Gothic laikan renders ἀκυράν in Luke i. 41, 44; vi. 23. From this idea of activity we pass to that of games, playing, dancing &c.; and so Gothic laiks = χορός in Luke xv. 25; in Icel., where the meaning play, sport is the prevailing one (see also compounds in which leik- occurs), leikr is used of dancing, athletics, various games, music, as in streng-leikr, leika = to play, to lake in the dialect of the North of England. In O. H. Ger. the application is generally to music, leih, leich = modus, modulus, carmen versus, but in rang-leih = wrestling the meaning is similar to the Icelandic (see Griff. ii. 152-3.) And just as plega is used, by itself or in its compounds, of war and battle, so in the Icelandic poetry we have Hildar leikr, sverða leikr = battle (see Cl. and Vig. Dict. p. 382, col. 2), and in English lāc could be applied in the same way. But in the latter language the more frequent meanings are those of offering, gift, and to connect these with the preceding ones Grimm notes the association of dancing and playing with offerings and sacrifices. From this special meaning of offering the more general one of gift, present might easily come. To quote his words 'Das wort (lāc) scheint einer wurzel mit dem goth. laiks (saltatio) ahd. leih (ludus, modus) altn. leikr, ursprünglich also tanz und spiel, die das opfer begleiteten, allmählich die gabe selbst zu bezeichnen,' D. M. 35. The passages which follow will shew the English use of the word. It might be supposed that lacu was taken from Latin lacus, and the fact that the gender of the Latin is not that of the English word does not disprove the supposition; for feminine porticus gives masculine portic, and masculine versus gives neuter fers. And in the specimens of later English just quoted (in Laym. it will be observed the gender is no longer feminine) it may have been to Latin that the English word is due; but there may have been at an earlier time a native word: cf. leccan to water, and O. II. a lode, watercourse (as a component in local names):—Mariscem quam circumfluit Iaegnlād, Cod. Dip. Kmbl. i. 190, 6. Ad aquæ ripam laenlāde, 163, 16. Cappelād, Wodelād are other instances occurring in the Charters.

III. carrying, carriage, bringing (see lēdan):—Sunnan-dæges cýpinge wē forbeoðað and ælc weorc and ælce lāde ægðer ge on wēne ge on horse ge on byrdene we forbid Sunday traffic and all work and all carrying (of goods, &c.) both by waggon and by horse and by the man himself, L. N. P. L. 55; Th. ii. 298, 22. [The word lād in this passage can hardly be translated 'journeying'; for, in the first place, such a meaning does not well suit the phrase on byrdene, and, next, some journeying was allowed. Thus, L. E. I. 24; Th. ii. 420, 21—, it is said no secular work was to be done 'būtan hwa[m]gebyrige ðæt hē nȳde faran scyle; ðonne mōt hē swā rīdan swā rōwan swā swilce færeldre faran swilce tō his wege gebyrige.' The threefold division of the means of carriage seems to be that found in the Icelandic law where, dealing with the observance of Sunday, it is said of the amount that might be carried in journeying on that day 'er rétt at bera á sjálfum sér (= on byrdene) eða fara á skipi eða bera á hrossi.'] On sumon hē sceal lāde lādan on some lands the 'genæt' has to furnish means of carriage, L. R. S. 2; Th. i. 432, 14. Cf. 436, 5-6.—Hē sceal beon gehorsad ðæt hē mæge tō hlāfordes seāme ðæt syllan oððe sylf lādan. The word used in both cases in the Latin translation is summāgium, in reference to which, and to the English words which it translates, may be quoted Thorpe's explanation in his glossary: 'Lād, seām, summāgium. A service, which consisted in supplying the lord with beasts of burthen, or, as defined by Roquefort (voce somey): "Service qu'un vassal devoit à son seigneur, et qui consistoit à faire faire quelques voyages par ses bêtes de somme." See Spelman sub voce, and Du Cange voce Sagma.' The phrase lāde lādan occurs in a similar passage, dealing with the duties of the 'genæt', in Cod. Dip. Kmbl. iii. 450, 31—Se genæt [at Dyddanham] sceal wyrcean swā on lande, swā of lande, hweder swā man bȳt and rīdan, and aerian, and lāde lādan, drāfe drifan, and fela oðra pinga dōn. The later English lode seems to keep this meaning. Thus Prompt. Parv. 310, loode or caryage vectura; lodysmanne vector, lator, vehicularius: the verb lead is found with the sense of carry, e. g. p. 62 cartyn or lede wythe a carte; and in the note, and again in a note on p. 293, we have the phrases 'to lede dong', 'to lede wheet,' &c. See also scip-lād. IV. Sustenance, provision, means of subsistence:—Ne sceal se dryhtnes þeow in his mōdesfan mære gelufian eorþan æhtwelan ðonne his ānes gemet ðæt hē his lichoman lāde habbe nor shall the servant of the Lord love more of earth's possessions, than a sufficiency for himself, that he may have sustenance for his body, Exon. 38 a; Th. 125, 27; Gū. 360. With this use of lād may be compared the later English lif-lode which, besides the meaning conduct, has that of sustenance:—Heo tilede here lyfode . . . heo fōden hem sustynance ynow, R. Glouc. 41, 22: Prompt. Parv. lyvelode victus; lyfode or waysonne donatium. So O. H. Ger. lib-leita victus, annona, alimonium. [In further illustration of lād the following native and foreign words are given. Orm. pe steorsemann a33 lokeþ þill an steorne patt stant a33 still . . . forr patt he wile follghenn a33 patt illke steornness lade (guidance); o lade on the way: *A. lād, e; f. I. excuse, defence against a charge:—Nū hī nabbaþ nāne lāde be hyra synne nunc excusationem non habent de peccato suo, Jn. Skt. 15, 22. ðætte hē nāne lāde ne mæge findan ac sīe sūa mid his āgnum wordum gebunden et in nulla sui defensione se exerceat, quam sententia proprii oris ligat, Past. 26, 3; Swt. 185, 16. Homl. 57, 20*. II. as a technical term in the laws, purgation, exculpation, the clearing one's self from a charge or accusation. The accused might clear himself by his own oath, supported by the oaths of a certain number of compurgators, or he might undergo some form of ordeal. The lād varied with the character of the deed with the commission of which the accused was charged. In the ānfeald lād, if the purgation were by oath, the oaths of the accused, and two others were necessary, in the þryfeald lād, the accused was to bring five compurgators; if the ordeal was used, in the former case the iron weighed one pound, in the latter, three. Other passages than those cited below, which may illustrate the terms ānfeald, þryfeald, are the following:—Wē cwædon be ðam morþslyhtum ðæt man dȳpte ðone āþ be þryfealdum and myclade ðæt ordālisen ðæt hit gewege þry pund, L. Ath. iv. 6; Th. i. 224, 12-14. Gange hē tō ðam þryfealdan ordāle; and ofgā man ðæt þryfealde ordāl ðus: nime fife and beo hine sylfa syxta, L. C. S. 30; Th. i. 394, 3-5; 44; Th. i. 402, 7. The term 'lād,' it will be seen from the following passages, does not, as Schmid observes, occur in the laws before Ethelred's time, canne and andsæc being used previously:—Gyf mon ðone hlāford teo . . . nime him fīf pegnas tō and beo him sylf syxta and lādie hine dæs. And gif seo lād forþcume beo hē dæs weres wyrde if the lord be accused . . . let him take to himself five thanes, and be himself the sixth, and clear himself of the charge. II. as a technical legal term [lād, II.] to clear from an accusation. [Amongst instances in which suspicion of crime is removed by the oath of the suspected party and the oaths of compurgators, may be taken that of King Alfonso who, when suspicion rested on him of complicity in the murder of his brother Sancho, cleared himself by the oaths of himself and twelve of his vassals. See the account in the Cronica del Cid, cc. 76-79.]—Gif se hūslāford hit nāt lādige hine [shall clear himself by oath] si latet fur, dominus domus . . . jurabit, quod non extenderet manum in rem proximi sui, Ex. 22, 8. lād-rinc, es; m. A word of uncertain meaning occurring in the following passage:—Gif cyngines ambhtsmip odde laadrinc mannan ofslēh meduman lōdgelde forgelde if the king's smith or 'ladrinc' kill a man, let him pay for it with a half fine [cf. § 21; Th. i. 8, 3], L. Ethb. 7; Th. i. 4, 8. The word, as Schmid observes, might have the same meaning as lād-mann q. v. just as Layamon uses the compound lōd-cniht, 'biforen rad heore lōd-cniht' 25730; or taking lād in the sense of journey the reference may be to a messenger of the king, cf. L. In. 33; Th. i. 122, 13 where it speaks of 'Cyniges horswealh se ðe him mæge geendrian'. But there is another use of lād [v. lād, II] which perhaps is that in the passage; then the lād-rinc would be the king's carrier, one who did for the king similar service to that which the genēd does for his lord. In the Prompt. Parv. lodysmanne is rendered by vector, lator, vehicularius.

lādung, e; f. I. An excusing, a clearing of or defending against a charge, an apology, excuse, a defence, exculpation:—Lādung apologia, Ælfic. Gl. 106; Som. 78, 64; Wrt. Voc. 57, 43; excussatio, Wrt. Voc. ii. 146, 15. God læt him fyrst ðæt hē his mādðæda geswicce gif hē wile; gif hē nele ðæt hē beo būtan ælcere lādunge swiðe rihtlice to deofles handa æscofen God allows the wicked man time, that he may, if he will, cease from his wicked deeds: that, if he will not, he may, having nothing to plead in his defence, very justly be thrust into the hands of the devil, Homl. Th. i. 270, 1. Mōd ymbtrymedu mid lytelicere lādunge mentes fallaci defensione circumdate, Past. 35, 5; Swt. 245, 8. Hī simle sceap endeleāse lādunga semper improbas defensiones querunt, 35, 2; Swt. 239, 8.

II. as a legal term, purgation, the clearing himself on the part of an accused person, by oath or by some form of ordeal, of the charge made against him:—And stande betwux burgum ān lagu æt lādunge, L. C. S. 34; Th. i. 396, 22. Biscoop sceall æt tihltan lādunge gedihthan ðæt ænig man oðrum ænig wōh beoðan ue mæge ādor odde on āpe odde on ordāle when accusation is made, the bishop shall so order the proceedings by which the accused is to clear himself, that no man may be able to offer wrong to another in the matter of taking oath or of undergoing the ordeal, L. I. P. 7; Th. ii. 312, 15. v. lād, lādian, be-lādung. lēo hair:—Lēo wifex casaries, Wrt. Voc. ii. 16, 46. [Icel. lá hair: cf. lō, lōð shagginess; also a flock of wool.] Perhaps we may compare here lee of threde, Prompt. Parv. 291, where the following note is given. 'Forty threads of hemp-yarn are termed in Norfolk a lea. The "lea" by which linen yarn was estimated at Kidderminster, contained 200 threads.' Halliwell gives as a northern word 'lea the seventh part of a hank or skein of worsted.'

læc; adj. The word, if this be the true form of it, occurs only once, in the following passage:—Gārulf georang ealra ærest . . . ymb hýne gōdra fela hwearf lacra hrær hræfn waudrore swart and sealobrūn, Fins. Th. 64-70; Fin. 33-5. All the editors for hrær, which Hickeys gives, read hræw, but in the MSS. r (n) and s (p) are so nearly alike that perhaps hræs, the genitive of hrā, was the original word. With regard to lacra various explanations have been given. Kemble and Conybeare print hwæarf lacra, Ettmüller reads hwæarf lacra, Thorpe hwæarf lādra, Grein hwæarf lacra. Taking the word to be independent, and retaining the reading of Hickeys, we may compare it with Icel. lakr lacking, defective, and render it by weak, failing (from wounds), wounded. Another form that attracts comparison is given by Graff ii. 100, lah, which has reference to cutting, and this suggests the rendering wounded. With the reading hræs for hrær the passage might be translated 'first of all sank down Gārulf . . . around him moved many a stout man weak or wounded in body: the raven wheeled round swart and dusky.' Ettmüller p. xxiv, giving a meaning to wandrian which it will hardly bear, translates the doubtful part of the passage 'volutibulum (= mortuorum) cadavera corvus conculcavit.' Similarly, as regards the first part, Conybeare has 'circa illum fortes multi caduci moribantur.'

læca, an; m. A leech, doctor, physician:—Se læca ðe sceal sære wunda wel gehælan hē mōt habban gōde sealfe ðærtō the doctor who has to make a good cure of painful wounds, must have good salve for the purpose, L. Pen. 4; Th. ii. 278, 15; 5; Th. ii. 278, 20. v. lāce.

LÆCE, es; m. I. A LEECH, [Shakspeare uses the word once, and even now it has not quite died out, but perhaps, in prose at least, its meaning is usually that given by Bailey in his Dictionary 'a Farrier or Horse-Doctor,' a doctor rather for animals than men], Doctior, physician:—Læce medicus, Wrt. Læce-finger, es; m. The leech-finger, the fourth finger [though in one gloss it seems to be the little-finger]:—Fuma pollex, scyrtelfinger index, middelfinger medius, læcefinger medicus, eáfefinger auricularius, Wrt. Voc. 71, 30–34. At p. 44, 7–8 the names are different:—Goldfinger medicus vel annularis, læcefinger auricularis, Ælf. Gl. 73; Som. 71, 22. Sing on ðīne læce-finger paternoster, Lchdm. i. 394, 2. [In later times it was the fourth finger e. g. Halliwell in his Dictionary quotes from a MS. of the 15th cent.

The lest fyngir hat lityl man, for hit is lest of alle;
The next fyngir hat leche man, for qwen a leche does ozt,
With that fyngir he tastes all thyng. howe that hit is wrozt.

In Prompt. Parv. p. 291 note the reason for the name is given differently. 'The fourth finger was called the leech finger, from the pulsation therein found, and supposed to be in more direct communication with the heart, as in the tract attributed to Joh. de Garlandia . . . it is said 'Stat medius [medylle fyngure] medio, medicus [leche fyngure] jam conuenit [accordy] egro.' See too in the same writer's Dictionary, Wrt. Voc. p. 121, 35 'medicus dicitur digitus eo quod illo medici imponunt medicinam.' Cf. Icel. læknis-fingr.]

-læred. v. ge-, sam-, þurh-, un-læred. lærest, least:—Æt ðam lærestan whitewamme iiii scillingas and at ðam mārān vi scill. for the smallest disfigurement of the face iiii shillings, for the greater vi shillings, L. Ethb. 56; Th. i. 16, 15. As this seems to be the only instance in which this form occurs, Schmid suggests that r is wrongly written for s, but the O. Frs. lerest may justify the presence of the r. v. læssa.

lærestre, an; f. A female teacher, an instructress, preceptress:—Lær-estre doctrix, Ælf. Gr. 9, 64; Zup. 71, 8. Siddan clypode heō hire tō ða ylcān lærestrean, Homl. Th. ii. 543, 8. [Cf. Wick. lerece: Prompt. Parv. lerare doctor, instructor: Goth. laisareis: O. H. Ger. lērari: Ger. lehrer; but the form to which these point, and which would be a masculine corresponding to lærestre, seems not to occur, the usual word being lærēow.]

lær-gedēfe:—Leorna lær lær gedēfe wene ðec in wiððom. Exon. 806; Th. 303, 31; Fā. 61. In this passage Etmüller and Grein take lærgedēfe as an adj. but lær may well be, as Thorpe takes it, the imperat. of læran, which verb naturally accompanies leornian.

lærig. A word of doubtful meaning occurring only twice:—Bærst bordes lærig, Byrht. Th. 140, 6; By. 284. Ne him bealubenne gebiden hæfdon ofer linde lærig, Cd. 154; Th. 192, 29; Exod. 239. Grein suggests comparison with λασθήριον a buckler, target, and that the word like rand may mean the rim of the shield and also the body of the shield. Either rendering is admissible so far as the sense is concerned.

læring, e; f. Instruction, teaching [see next two words and Icel. læring teaching, learning: O. H. Ger. lēruna institutio, doctrina.]

Lind. 12, 45.

lættest; adv. Lastly, at last, finally.—Lættest (lættest, Lind.) novissime, Mk. Skt. Rush. 16, 14.

læst; superl. of læt. Last:—De læst [ða lættesta, Lind.] the last, Mt. Kmb. Rush. 22, 27. [O. Eng. Homl. latest: Orm. latst: A. R. Laym. last.]

læð, es; n. Land.—Ðō swā ic lære beo ðē [Lchdm. dū] be ðinum and læt mē be minum ne gyrne ic ðines ne lēdes ne landes ne sace ne sōcne ne ðū minnes ne þearft do as I advise; be thou with thine and leave me to mine; I desire nothing of thine, neither lea nor land, neither 'sac' nor 'socn'; nor needest thou mine, L. O. 14; Th. i. 184, 15; Lchdm. iii. 288, 8. The Icelandic has the same alliterative phrase, e. g. 'deyr fē; deyja frændr; eyðisk land ok læð.'

læð a lathe [e. g. Kent is divided into six lathes], a district containing several hundreds, v. Stubbs' Const. Hist. i. 100. The word occurs in the Latin laws of Edward the Confessor:—In quibusdam vero provinciis Anglice vocabatur læð, quod isti dicunt tithinge [or trihinge], Th. i. 455, n. 3. In L. Hen. i. viii. 2 occurs amongst the names of other officials leidegrevei=læðgeréfan, Th. i. 514, note 1. Cf. Icel. leið, leidangr a levy: Dan. leding, Skeat, Etymol. Dict. under lathe, suggests that læð=lægð, in which case perhaps it may be compared with Dan. lægd a levying district.

læðan; p. de To speak ill of, accuse, abuse, execrate, detest, hae:—Man eall hyrweþ ðæt man scolde herian and ladeþ [læðeþ?] ðæt man scolde lufian people scorn what they ought to praise, and hate what they ought to love, Swt. S. 1; Th. i. 376, 7. In the phrases on Engla, Dena, &c. lage, which may be compared with the Icel. i þrænda lögum, lagu is nearly equivalent to 'district in which certain [English, Danish, &c.] laws prevail,' and in Cl. & V. Dict. [v. lög ii.] lög is rendered 'law community, communion, also a law district.' So in L. E. G. 7; Th. i. 172, 3 it is said:—Gif hlāford his þeowan freōlsdæge nýðe tō weorce gylde lablisse inn on Deone lage and wite mid Englum. These laws are the first in which lagu or lah- occurs, afterwards these forms are not unfrequent, and are continued in the Laws of William the Conqueror 'en Dene lahe, en Merchene lahe, en West Sexene lahe,' Th. i. 466, and in L. H. I. 'in Denelaga,' 566. From the time of the appearance of the word it would seem that its use was due to Scandinavian influence. v. Steenstrup's Normannerne, iv. 15 sqq. In Icelandic the word is used in the sense of law only in pl. lög: Dan. lov. v. land-, mæg-, riht-, þegen-, un-, woruld- laga; laga and lah.

L. 67; Th. ii. 302, 5. Lahcōp, L. Eth. iii. 3; Th. i. 294, 1. In the note on the latter passage an illustration is quoted from old Danish Law, where 'bylagh' [town law] being lost under certain conditions after an absence of a year and a day, a man 'bör at köbe sigh thet igen a ny.' The term is found in Old Sleswick Law:—'Rex habet quoddam speciale debitum in Slæswick, quod dicitur Læghkōp, quo redimitur ibi hereditas [quorundam] morientium.' In the same passage occurs the phrase 'emere lagh.' v. lah.

lah-lic; adj. Lawful, Scint. 9, Lye. v. next word.

lah-lice; adv. Lawfully, according to law:—Ne ure nænig his lif ne fadode swā swā hē scolde ne gehādode regollice ne læwede lahllice nor hath any one of us ordered his life as he should, neither those ordained according to their rules nor the laymen according to the law, Swt. M

Original m, generally speaking, is preserved in Anglo-Saxon, and is found corresponding to m in the Gothic and other cognate dialects, e. g. mē, manna, dōm; Goth. mik, manna, dōms. When, however, m is not initial, the correspondence is not always maintained; thus, A. S. fif, but Goth. fimf; A. S. sōfte, O. H. Ger. samfto. Also for earlier fn is found mn, as in emn along with efn, Goth. ibn; stemn and stefn, Goth. stibna. In some inflexions m is no longer found; so in the 1st pers. pres. indic. eom is the only instance in which the old person-ending has maintained itself; though beon, dōn, and gān offer occasional instances of its retention in the Northern Gospels; while the m which is found in the plural of the Gothic and O. H. Ger. conjugations has left no trace. In declensions n in the later times began to take the place of m in the dative, so ðan for ðam.

The form of the Runic letter, whose name was man, was , but from the similarity to the d-rune (dæg) , the two seem to be sometimes confounded. In each case the symbol was sometimes employed, after the runes had been generally supplanted by the Latin letters, to express the word which was its name; thus in the Durham Ritual quis is glossed ænig , nemo, ne ænig : the same symbol being also used to gloss dies. The form of the rune accompanying the Runic poem is , Kmbl. plate 16, fig. 11, and the verse attached to it the following:—

Man byþ on myrgþe
his mægan leof
sceal deāh ānra gehwyle ōðrum swāric
fordam dryhten wile
dōme sýnum
ðæt earme flæsc
eorþan betæcan.

Men will be cheerful,
dear to their friends,
shall yet each one
depart from other,
for the Lord will
by his doom
the 'vile body'
commit to earth.

metod, metod, meotud, meotod, es; m. A word found only in poetry (the phrase se metoda drihten occurs twice in Ælfric's Homilies, but in alliterative passages). The earlier meaning of the word in heathen times may have been fate, destiny, death (cf. metan), by which Grein would translate metod in Wald. 1, 34; Val. 1, 19:—Ðý ic ðē metod ondrēð ðæt ðū tō fyrenlice feohtan sōhtest (Stephens here takes metod as vocative with the meaning of prince); in this sense it seems to be used in its compounds, and in the Icelandic mjötudr weird, bane, death (Cl. and Vig. mjötudr, II). Could this be the meaning in the phrase se metoda drihten used of Christ in the following passages?—Ne dorston ða deóflu, ða ðā hī adræfde wæron, intō ðam swýnum, gif hē him ne sealde leáfe, ne intō nānum men forðan se metoda drihten eryl gecynd hæfde on him sylfum genumen, Homl. Th. ii. 380, 4-7. Gemyndig on mōde hū se metoda drihten cwæþ on his godspelle be his godcundan tōcyme, 512, 27. But the word, which occurs frequently, is generally an epithet of the Deity as the O. Sax. metod; so too Icel. mjötudr (Cl. and Vig. mjötudr, I) is applied to heathen gods:—Metod engla, lifes brytta, Cd. 6; Th. 8, 9; Gen. 136. Blidheort cýning, metod alwihta monna cýnnes, 10; Th. 12, 29; Gen. 193. Hine forwæc metod mancýnne fram, Beo. Th. 220; B. 110. Metod O Lord! Elen. Kmbl. 1634; El. 819. Ðā nam man ðæt wif and ādrencte hī æt Lundenebrice, Chart. Th. 230, 17.

III. murder; (a) as a technical term, slaying with an attempt at concealment of the deed. Cf. the distinction in Icelandic law between morþ murder and víg manslaughter, 'þat er morþ ef maðr leynir eða hylr hræ ok gengr eigi i gegn,' but if declaration (lysing) were made it was víg. v. Cl. & Vig. Dict. and Grmm. R. A. 625. Schmid. A. S. Gesetz, p. 633, suggests that morþ has particular reference to death caused by witchcraft or by poison, and refers to the connection in which the compounds morþ-dæd-, weorc-, uyrhta occur: see the passages given under those words. See also the last passage under II:—Gif open morþ weorþe ðæt man sý āmyrdred āgife man māgum ðone banan and gif hit titlre sý and æt lāde mistide ðeme se bisceop if there be a death and it afterwards appear that the man was murdered, the (supposed) murderer being discovered, let the latter be given up to the kinsmen (of the slain man), and if the accusation be brought, and the attempt of the accused to clear himself fail, let the bishop pass sentence, L. C. S. 57; Th. i. 406, 25. Æbere morþ æfter woruldage is bōtleas slaying, which is proved to be murder, according to the secular law, cannot be compounded for, 65; Th. i. 410, 5. (b) as a general term, murder, homicide:—Hī swylc geblōt and swylc morþ dōnde wæron (of Busiris sacrificing strangers to the gods), Ors. 1, 8; Swt. 40, 26. Ðæs ðe hē blōdgyte, wālfyll weres wæpnum geseþeþ, morþ mid mundum, Cd. 75; Th. 92, 13; Gen. 1528. [Laym. morþ destruction: O. Sax. morð: O. Frs. morth: Icel. mord: *O. H. N.

N, like m (q. v.), in Anglo-Saxon generally corresponds to n in Gothic and in other cognate dialects, e. g. net, hand, an; Goth. nati, handus, ains; O. H. Ger. nezzi, hant, ein; O. Sax. net, hand, en; but, like m, it falls away before ð and s, and the vowel which preceded the n is lengthened, e. g. cūð, iōð, oðer, mūd, hūsel, est; Goth. kunþs, tunþus, anþar, munþs, hunsl, ansts; O. H. Ger. chund, zand, andar, mund, anst; O. Sax. kūð, tand, oðar, mūd, anst. If, however, n and s come together by the loss of an intervening vowel the n remains, e. g. winstre; O. H. Ger. O. Sax. winstar. The character which appears in the Runic poem is ʀ, and the verse, in which the name (cf. Icel. naudr) is given, is the following:—

Nýd byþ nearu on breōste	oft tō helpe
nīða bearnum,	and tō hǣle gehwæðre weorðeþ heō deāh	gif hī his hlýstaþ æwor.

Runic pm. Kmbl. 341, 8-13.

or-déle; adj. Not having or taking part in a thing, not participat- ing:—Ordéle expers, Wrt. Voc. ii. 31, 48: 90, 67. Ordéla expers, i. ignarus, alienus, sine parte, imperitus, inscius, priuatus, Wülck. Gl. 232, 23. or-dāl, -dél; generally neuter, but an apparently fem. acc. pl. ordéla occurs, L. Edg. C. 24; Th. ii. 248, 28. (Cf. O. H. Ger. which has fem. and neut. forms.) In the sense of judicial decision, judgment the word is used by O. Frs. O. Sax. O. H. Ger. (v. Richthofen, the Heliand and Graff), but in A. Sax. it is found only in the special sense, which belongs also to the O. Frs., of a decision which follows an appeal to the Deity. The ordeal was thus connected with religion, and attended by religious ceremonies. In L. Ath. i. 23; Th. i. 210, 26, it is said with respect to the person who is to undergo the ordeal 'fēde hine sylfne mid hlāfe and mid wātere and sealte and wyrtum ær hē tō gān scyle, and gestande him mæssan ðæra þreora daga (the three days preceding the ordeal) ælcne, and geoffrige tō, and gā tō hūsle ðý dæge ðe hē tō ðam ordāle gān scyle, and swerige ðonne ðane āþ, ðæt hē sý unscyldig ðære tihltan ær hē tō ðam ordāle gā.' Before taking the Eucharist and going to the ordeal a solemn form of adjuration was addressed to the person concerned, that unless he was conscious of innocence he should desist. v. Rtl. 114, 13-23. The further proceedings in connection with the ordeal by hot water or by hot iron are detailed in L. Ath. iv. 7; Th. i. 226, 8. After the fire to be used in heating was carried into the church, none were to enter but the priest and the accused. When the iron was hot or the water boiled, two men for the accused, two for the accuser, were admitted, to see that the proceedings were fairly conducted. When hot water was employed, if it were a case of ánfeald tihltle, the hand was plunged in up to the wrist, if of threefold, up to the elbow. When the hot iron was used, a weight of one pound or of three pounds, according to the case, had to be carried nine feet. The hand was then sealed up, and its condition, when unwrapped at the end of three days, determined the guilt or innocence of the accused. See also L. Ath. i. 23; Th. i. 212, 2-10. Further reference to the difference in degree is made in Ath. iv. 6; Th. i. 224, 13: L. Edg. H. 9; Th. i. 260, 18. Among those who were to be subjected to this form of trial are mentioned convicted perjurers, who after conviction are not 'āþwyrdæ ac ordāles wyrdæ,' L. Ed. 3; Th. i. 160, 18-21: the man who was charged with plotting against his lord, or with being guilty of 'cýricbryce,' or with practising witchcraft and similar illicit arts underwent the threefold ordeal, L. Ath. i. 4-6; Th. i. 202, 1-17; and the same trial was appointed in the case of incendiaries, L. Ath. iv. 6; Th. i. 224, 11-19, and of coiners, L. Ath. i. 14; Th. i. 206, 17-25: L. Eth. iii. 8; Th. i. 296, 12-16. The ordeal is also mentioned as being the only method of meeting an accusation in a case between English and Welsh, 'ne stent nān oðer lād æt tihltan būte ordāl betweox Wealan and Englan,' L. O. D. 2; Th. i. 354, 1-2. The ordeal must take place in a king's burgh, 'Ælc ordāl beo on ðæs kyniges byrig,' L. Eth. iii. 6; Th. i. 296, 4, and upon fastdays and festivals could not be used, 'ordāl and āpas syndan tōcwedene freōlsdagum and rihtfæstendagum,' L. E. G. 9; Th. i. 172, 10: L. Eth. v. 18; Th. i. 308, 24-27: vi. 25; Th. i. 320, 24-27: L. Edg. C. 24; Th. ii. 248, 27. ōs a divinity, god, the Anglo-Saxon form of a word whose existence in Gothic is inferred from a passage in Jormandes, 'Gothi proceres suos quasi qui fortuna vincebant non pares homines sed semideos, id est, Anses vocavere.' The Icelandic, which throws out n before s, as the Anglo-Saxon does (cf. Icel. gās: A.S. gōs), has áss; pl. æsir, a term which has an application in the opening chapters of the Yngling Saga very similar to that attributed to anses among the Goths: Odin, Thor, and other personages of the Scandinavian mythology are the Æsir. Particularly apparently did the term refer to Thor, so that the proper name Ás-björn is used as the equivalent of Þor-björn. As the first part of Scandinavian proper names it occurs frequently, and it is in the same dependent character that it mostly, if not exclusively, is found in Anglo-Saxon and O. H. German. Thus Ös-beorn, Ös-lác, Ös-wine, Ös-weald preserve the word which is found in Ás-björn, Ás-lákr, Ás-mundr, and this is certainly the independent áss. The O. H. Ger. Ans-gār shews the same word. Whether ōs in the sense of god occurs as an independent word is doubtful. It is the name of the Rune $\mathfrak{Ans}$, which in the Runic poem is accompanied by the following verse:—

‘Ös byþ orðfruma ælcra spræce
Wisdōmes wraðu and witenra frōfur
And eorla gehwam eadnís and tōhyht.’
Runic pm. Kmbl. 340, 5–10; Rún. 4.

Kemble translates ōs by mouth (as if the Latin word had been taken?), but if the verse is old, the reference might be to Woden. Cf. the account of Öðinn in the Ynglinga Saga: þar þóttust Öðins menn eiga alt traust, er hann var, c. 2. Öðinn var gúfgast af öllum, ok af honum nāmu þeir allir iþróttirnar: því at hann kunni fyrst allar ok þó flestar. . . . Hann ok hófgodar hans heita ljótasmidir, því at sú iþrótt hófst af þeim i nordr-löndum, c. 6. See also c. 7, and Salm. Kmbl. p. 192: Saga mē hwa ærost bōcstafas sette? Ic ðe secge Mercurius (= Woden) se gygand. Further in Lchdm. iii. 54, in a charm, occurs a genitive pl. ēsa:—Gif hit wære ēsa gescot, oððe hit wære ylfa gescot, oððe hit wære hægtessan gescot, nū ic wille ðín helpan. ðis ðe tō bōte ēsa gescotes, &c. . . . But though on the comparison of other forms, a nom. pl. ēs might be inferred for ōs, the change of vowel would not occur in the genitive, which should be ōsa. Ēsa would point to a singular ēs (cf. ēst; Goth. ansts). The meaning however of the word is that given to ōs. See Grmm. D. M. p. 22.
